Global Diversity & Inclusion at Microsoft

You work for diversity consulting firm IDEA, Inc. (Inclusion and Diversity Excellence in Action). Your team has been called to your boss’ office to get your next big diversity project assignment. Marci, your boss, has been reading articles, blog posts and social media commentary on Microsoft’s challenges and innovative efforts in the area of diversity and inclusion. She would like IDEA, Inc. to create a comprehensive plan to propose to leadership at Microsoft on how they can improve workforce diversity and multicultural inclusion in the workplace at Microsoft. She wants your team to develop that plan and pitch it to Microsoft’s leadership.

Microsoft currently employs a variety of strategies and tactics to achieve the goal of “a more diverse and inclusive Microsoft.” Those strategies can be found on their Global Diversity and Inclusion page, as well as their Careers Page.

Why Diversity Matters
An article in Open Forum states that diversity matters in the workplace because it: 1) builds your employer brand; 2) increases creativity; 3) encourages personal growth; and 4) makes employees think more independently. Dennis Nally at PwC adds a list of business arguments for diversity and inclusion in the workplace, but leads off with, “Diversity and inclusion are quite simply the right thing to do.” In a global marketplace, competition and consumers require that firms attract and retain the best talent, and that means a diversity of talent. Your team should research the business and societal reasons why an organization like Microsoft should proactively address issues of diversity, equity, and inclusion.

Inclusion and Engagement
Microsoft (and the whole tech industry) faces strong critiques for its lack of diversity. Both before and after these critiques, the company developed a robust portfolio of diversity and inclusion initiatives, and has made achievements in their diversity journey. The company has linked its diversity goals to corporate bonuses, creating management incentives just as they did.
with their initiative to become carbon neutral. Yet, progress remains slow and the company acknowledges there is much more to do.

Employee engagement (in the workplace and the community) is an increasingly important part of the puzzle, and Microsoft has been working to engage its minority workers. Creating a sense of community is critical, and they state, “Our employees are a bridge to our customers. So it’s important that they feel encouraged to contribute their unique insights and skills to help solve some of the most complex technology challenges.” (Microsoft website) To this end, they support 7 major employee groups and over 40 employee networks that help to create a culture of support and community that encourages a higher level of engagement, participation, and inclusion.

Marci has asked your team to create a proposal and presentation for Microsoft that: a) leverages their current activities, initiatives and plans to create more impact; and b) suggests new and innovative ways to help Microsoft achieve their goals, based on creative new ideas for workforce diversity and inclusion. Your team should create a “sales pitch” to Microsoft that includes both strategic analysis and detailed implementation plans. You should consider the risks, rewards, and implications for the stakeholder groups involved in your recommendations as well as the potential impact on the Microsoft brand and image. Your team’s goal is to gain Microsoft as a client for IDEA, Inc.

As we transform our business and culture, the value proposition for diversity and inclusion within Microsoft is increasingly clear -- a diverse and inclusive workforce will yield better products and solutions for our customers, and better experiences for our employees. We actively seek to enable the full contribution of our employees through greater levels of diversity in our workforce and a spirit of inclusion within our environment.
