They label me as shy,
a tag I can not easily cut off, even with the sharpest pair of scissors in my hand.
That word brings with it a loaded package full of misunderstandings.

They believe I am only silent, but I am waiting to disclose to the right group of people – or to be more specific – the right person, where I get their undivided attention knowing they have mine in return, without my voice drowning out in a roaring ocean swarmed with crowded people.

At a social event, streams of people flood downstream towards the center of commotion, as I go upstream in the opposite way to find one person who I can reside with, clinging to their firm and reassuring arm through the chaos of the blinding lights, blasting music, and boisterous chatter.

Friendship is something I do not ignore because it is difficult to grasp like a bar of soap that slips out of hand with a lack of control.
What is difficult to grasp is when they think I choose to put myself away, alone in the corner like an unwanted joker in a pool of playing cards.
In reality, I am an introvert.

I am not a quiet goldfish peering out into the world, through the watery lens of a blurry glass window, but I live in it too. Even though I prefer to thread through a tranquil body of water. I recognize the power in my voice and acknowledge its existence to express my desires, knowing fully that its wave does not need to crash the loudest upon shore the to be heard. Its peaceful ripple leaving trails of bubbles behind are enough to be visible.
So do not let the false label make you think otherwise.
