Creepers
Dr. Rich Furman

Misnamed indelicate plodding, but with the right pair of jeans, my feet grin fungal-smiles, they remember for me.

The knobby rubber sole that squealed even on carpet, that I fumbled with when fleeing faces on the brink can barely recall the clumsy metal buckle the edge of dorm-room beds, an eighteen-year-old boy pretending he was a man, wrestling crusted dishes ramen dignified with shallots, and the Infinity avoided like statistics, and lips like whispering hammers on girls ready for love.

And now I forget most of the details, jeans faded from dancing thighs and sun, clunky crimson zapatos courage.
