Keeping the Lights On Marcie Pierson

If it's darkness we're having, let it be extravagant.—Jane Kenyon

It's a week after Epiphany the Kings have found their way, and still, vestiges of Christmas are strung along houses, draped across shrubs.

In our window a solitary light glows,
mirrored across the street, like the Civil War custom—a candle in the window until the soldiers come home.

Every year since 9.11
I watch the lights go up sooner, stay lit longer,
in the January darkness that comes too early.

They called me crazy the first time I dragged our cut tree to the back deck,
ornaments boxed away,
the lights still attached.
Easter came. I decorated it with plastic eggs, switched on the lights at dusk, kept the tree there until May, the branches turned brown.

This year it was easier. No one complained about the crystal-lit Noble that graced our deck 'til spring. In the distance . . .

the lights of the Narrows Bridge Project guide the workers, illuminate the night sky, change color now and then—while the community rallies to keep them on, whatever the cost.
