Poetry

is the awl
that lends your soul to scrutiny, turns your gaze into yourself to seek the side
furthest from the sun.

Raw
is what you feel when memory is slow to heal
like the hole in your heart from the gunshot in your mind—red rush
of words
falling line,
by line
pigment of your imagination splattered on a paper world crescendo of breathing
excitement for words
ciphers and erasures brushed carelessly away—
rub-weary eyes ruminate,
grope
the darkness of your intentions...

Inner tempest
makes you naked—makes
wind on your skin,
whips your hair,
crawls
into the spaces of contemplation.
